

The C.V.V.

Everyone capable of forming an opinion has asked that I pass an opinion on the demonstration that took place this week on campus.

Personally I'm glad to see that someone on campus takes enough interest in anything to demonstrate for it. My praise, of little value that it is anyway, stops right there though.

I wonder how many of the participants knew what they were marching for? I wonder that the entire show was valuable enough to bother the president of the United States at 2 in the morning with? I wonder about the leadership that told Bob Manning he was unpatriotic because he wouldn't give them sound equipment without going through the proper channels? (Mr. Manning was a member of Uncle Sam's Army for 4 years.) I wonder about the misrepresentation of a group that told Steve Mitchell (who knew nothing about it) that they had already talked to him and that he had agreed to speak for them — or the gross misrepresentation that told this writer that he had agreed to print a letter for them when, in fact, he had never met them before (nor they him)? I wonder, too, how many of them would care to enlist and do something constructive to advance Uncle Sam's war?
