Real Heat On Rep. Mills

WASHINGTON—The Senate's move to limit the power of the draft board in proposing changes to the Selective Service System has caused concern among many draft opponents. The proposal, introduced by Senator John Smith, would require the draft board to submit its proposals to Congress for approval before they can be implemented.

The bill has met with strong opposition from the military and the draft board itself, which argues that the proposals are necessary to ensure the integrity of the draft system.

Meanwhile, President Jackson has signed the bill into law, allowing the proposals to be implemented.

Lawyers Challenge

The challenge raises important questions about the role of the courts in the draft system, and the extent to which they can serve as a check on the power of the draft board.

The challenge is expected to be heard by the Supreme Court, which will decide whether the draft board has the authority to make the proposed changes.

The challenge is a major test of the draft system, and its outcome will have significant implications for the future of the draft system.
