Women's Job Corps Center At NMU Slated To Be Closed

U.S. Set To Shut 65 Sites

Washington (AP) - The U.S. Department of Labor has confirmed that the Job Corps program, which is expected to be shut down in the coming months, will result in the loss of over 20,000 jobs nationwide. The agency has announced that the decision was made after careful consideration of the program's effectiveness and the impact on the local communities.

Michael Corbin, the administrator for the Job Corps, said in a statement: "After a thorough review of the program, we have determined that it is no longer meeting our goals and needs." The announcement comes as part of the broader effort to reduce government spending and allocate resources more efficiently.

The Job Corps, established in 1964, was designed to provide education and training for young people who were not in school or employment. It has been criticized in recent years for not achieving its intended outcomes, with many graduates finding it difficult to secure stable employment.

Negotiations between the two sides have broken down over the future of the program, leading to the decision. The U.S. Labor Department has been under pressure to make tough decisions to reduce costs and improve the overall efficiency of the government.

The announcement has been met with mixed reactions, with some expressing concern for the impact on the communities served by the Job Corps, while others see it as a necessary step to improve the program's effectiveness.

Meanwhile, another government program, the Veterans' Employment and Training Service (VETS), has announced that it will be expanding its services to help more veterans transition into the workforce. This move is part of a broader effort to support veterans as they navigate the challenges of post-military life.

Cutback Includes Ojibway

Northern Michigan University's Women's Job Corps Center was recently announced to be closed after 30 years of service. The decision was made as part of the university's efforts to reduce costs and realign resources.

The center, which served as a training ground for Native American women, has been a significant source of support for the community. The closure will impact not only the students who were enrolled but also the broader community.

The university has pledged to work with the community to ensure a smooth transition and to explore options for continuing the center's mission in a different form.
